BLUE MOLD ON WAY UP FROM SOUTHLAND

Blue mold, one of the tobacco grower's foremost threats, is well on its way on its annual trek up from the deep South toward Virginia.

S. B. Fenne, plant pathologist at VPI, who keeps a wary eye on the progress of the disease, reports that blue mold has been found and identified in several North Carolina counties. The disease has been reported as far west as Johnson County on a farm near Princeton, located 25 miles east of Raleigh.

Damage caused by blue mold is described as slight thus far, but recent weather conditions have been favorable for its spread, and farmers who do not apply chemicals to control it can look for trouble.

The Texas Department of Safety speaks of traffic fatalities as "motorsides."

Appomattox is a growing town.
